"We are trying to open up the whole section of the city," Reeves said. "This is where Houston was born." A spokesman for the developer, Bob Riesbeck, said the proposal is for a new project, not for the space once occupied by the railroad tracks. The property would be a mixed-use site with retail, restaurants and other offices on the ground floor. Parking, he said, would be underground. The iconic dome buildings will be preserved, said Jarrell Baxter, another spokesman for the developer. The two-year-old development firm is partnering with the city's Downtown Management District to develop the 12.5-acre site. The Downtown Management District is a public-private partnership created by city voters to manage the city's downtown, including expanding and enhancing the area's cultural offerings. The proposed building, renamed GoHouston, would be the second major downtown high-rise project after the AT&T Center, an arena for the Houston Rockets and Texas A&M basketball team.
